He astonished the world with a series of extremely bold climbs on the world's highest peaks. He became widely recognized in 1999 after his famous solo ascent of the south face of Dhaulagiri, considered one of the deadliest routes in the Himalayas. During a solo attempt to climb Nanga Parbat in 2005, Humar became trapped by avalanches at an altitude of nearly 6000m, after six days in a snow cave he was rescued by a Pakistan Army helicopter crew. Because of the audacity of the climb, the fame of the climber, the high risk of the rescue, and the hourly updates on his base camp website the world was watching. By exposing the rescuers to such risk and for his desire of fame and publicity he turned many in the climbing world against him. His routes were seldom repeated and often considered suicidal and he mostly climbed alone. In 2007 Humar climbed the Eastern summit of Annapurna solo via a route at the far eastern end of the South Face. He died in 2009, aged 40, whilst descending on a solo climb of the South Face of Langtang Lirung.* 77453, £195.
